CASALIAN FOUNT.

FOR THE CENTINEL.

LINES,

On the Prize of FIFTEEN HUNDRED DOLLARS being drawn by the poor Widows of Marblehead, written there.

WHENCE this increase of wealth? What bounteous hand [mand?] Grants more than sanguine Hope could e'en denote Chance, nor Fortune shall the merit claim, Those fancied forms to Folly owe their name: Such airy phantoms ill deserve our lays; A nobler object calls forth all our praise. That Pow'r Supreme, who knows no great or small, But looks unchang'd with equal eye on all—Who lifts the poor from their unnoted state, And humbles at his will th' aspiring great—Whose hand divine hath held us in its span, And fed, and cloth'd us since our lives began—Hath, sure, this last rich gift in kindness lent, To be improv'd, and not in riot spent; A further proof of Heav'n's indulgent care, In which our poorer neighbours ought to share. Accept, Great God, what thankful hearts can give, For life and health, and all the means to live! Much thou hast added to our former store; O keep us still as humble as before! What thou hast lent, direct us how to use, And teach us when to give, and when refuse. To others freely let our bounty flow, But not beyond Discretion's limits go. Then let us live as useful as we can—Grateful to God—beneficent to man—Possess obscure the bliss of doing good, Never to well explain'd as understood.

MONITOR, NO. 302.

The man whose virtue is free from all affection pleases of itself.

BENEVOLUS is open, civil, complaisant and gay; he rallies and divers himself; if he attacks any one it is without ill nature; he every day tells himself, that he likewise is a man; he appears neither too modest, nor too reserved, though every one sees he is both: He prays and examines himself in his closet; but no body knows it; no body hears him.—Thus, after privately confuting his own actions, he comes out prepared, sees the irregularities of his fellow-men, and bears with them: The faults of those he converses with he reproves with mildness, not proudly laying to himself, I am exempt from them. Virtue he admires, without trusting that he has it; he ever distrusts his own prudence, being sensible of his own weakness; he rather chuses to depend on the virtues of another, because he judges charitably; he distinguishes himself neither by his dress, nor his looks—his manner of life, nor by a publick devotion. He is an honest man: Every one sees and must confess it, he alone neither says it, nor believes it with vanity.
